Dr. Chan Chang-Chuan, Dean of the College of Public Health (CPH) of National Taiwan University (NTU) led a delegation to visit the Georgetown University (GU) on March 19, 2019. The delegation includes 4 faculty members and 2 administrative staff, all from CPH.

The major purpose of the delegation's visit to GU was to understand the current trends of the public health education and policies, such as developments on epidemic prevention and long-term care practice. They would also like to explore possible chances of cooperation with GU, including programs like short-term exchange of faculty and students, joint researches, and hopefully being able to establish joint-degree programs between the two universities in the long run.

Assisted by the Education Division of the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office (TECRO) in the United States and Dr. Judy Wang of GU's Dept. of Oncology, the delegation met with Dean Patricia Cloonan of GU's School of Health Studies (SHS). They also attended a meeting hosted by Dr. Bernhard Liese, Chairman of GU's Dept. of International Health, and had a comprehensive discussion on the above topics with 11 faculty members from SHS.

Dean Chan also introduced CPH's newly-launched "Master of Global Health" (MGH) program at the meeting. Since GU also has a similar program called "Global Initiative," which requires GU's undergraduate students to conduct a 6-month internship overseas, Dr. Liese thinks it would be an excellent pathway to plan the students exchange or even a joint degree between the two universities. Both sides agree to keep communicating, and hope to realize the cooperation in the near future.

Director Yuri Chih of TECRO's Education Division also expressed the appreciation to Dean Cloonan, Dr. Liese and Dr. Wang who offered assistance during NTU's visit. All delegation members enjoyed the visit very much, which became one of the highlights of their U.S. trip this time.
